Excerpt: . lived ill he lived again in a lower form than that in which he had sinned, he would pass into an animal, or a person of lower rank, and it would take him more such lives to get to the end of the existences ordained for him. If he lived well, he rose in the scale at his next birth and came nearer to the end. The best of all would be when he had passed through all the lives appointed for him, and could die his last death from which he would not need to be born into the world any more. This doctrine of re-birth or transmigration is often thought to be characteristic of Buddhism in which it is certainly prominent, but no one can read the Upanishads without seeing that it had taken possession of the mind of India before...
