ORGANIZATION OF LABOUR AND CAPITAL. All material wealth is produced and appropriated by the exercise of human force, --especially organized human force. The persons who exercise such force are labourers living on wages earned for the most part by the exercise of physical force. Labourers are either producers or appropriators of wealth. Among producers of wealth, the most valuable class is that of agricultural labourers; among appropriators of wealth, the most valuable class is that of private soldiers. Increase of force and wealth of a nation is mainly dependent on increase of the effectiveness of the above two classes of labourers. It will easily be perceived that the effectiveness of any special class of labourers devoted to the practice of a particular art, will be proportional to the health and strength of the component individuals, and to the goodness of their training, instruction, and organization. The development of the entire force of all the component individuals of every class of labourers, both for separate and concerted action, is the object of every good system of organization of labour. In order to form a well-organized class of soldiers or other kind of labourers, the first step to be taken would be to teach each individual, by precept and example, how all the requisite movements of the body and limbs are to be performed, and then to exercise him in those movements until his practice is nearly perfect. The second step would consist...
