CHAPTER XVIII CARIBEE SHOTS THE RAPIDS OF THE IRON GATES THE 18th of August was a very hot day in the year 1891, at least to me. There was scarcely a breath of wind; I had been paddling from 7 in the morning until nearly noon; the Servian shore seemed as uninteresting as the Hungarian, and even the singing and piping of the peasants on the banks failed to stimulate me. Two frontier soldiers on the Hungarian side promised a momentary diversion. They shot out at me from behind a reedy island, one rowing, the other steering. Oh! for a fair wind I prayed, what a dance might I then have led them-- though when they had headed me off, and I noticed two rifles within convenient reach, I remembered that frontier guards along this river have a reputation for shooting on slight provocation. Our conversation was as follows: Guard: Where from CARIBEE: Budapesth, Guard: Where going Caribee: Black Sea. The guards gave a few suspicious and dissatisfied grunts, pulled away to their island, and left me to work along as before. Fortunately not for long, for a sharp turn in the stream brought me face to face with one of the grandest bits of scenery in the world. A spur of the Transylvanian Alps crosses the Danube here, between Bazias and Turn-Severing, and forces the stream between rocky sides that spring precipitously to the sky. I felt as though entering some cavernous region of...
